

CALL MR. ROBESON: A life, with songs.

Written and Performed by Tayo Aluko, with Michael Conliffe, Piano
Tristan Bates Theatre, Covent Garden, London, Friday 18 October, 2013.

Greetings, and Welcome. As winter gets nearer, most of us start to worry about money, and certainly about keeping warm. It is embarrassing too for Downing Street that someone there has suggested one way of keeping warm through the winter is to wear sweaters indoors. While their PR machine tries to repair the damage, it can't hide the central fact – that even the government are practically powerless to halt the drive of the energy companies to make as much profit as possible for their shareholders by continually raising prices, with the population being made to suffer if they are not wealthy. Many elderly people are likely to suffer more than most, and it is interesting that a minister has today raised the issue of the care of the elderly as a national shame, suggesting that we could learn from other, non-Western parts of the world. His concerns would be easier to sustain if he didn't belong to a party which has completion and the profit motive as one of its core values. We heard recently of carers in the private sector being told they had strict limits (15 minutes?) to the amount of time they had to care for the elderly. That is surely because the staff are being paid by the hour, and the profits will be damaged if the staff costs become excessive. The welfare of the people being cared for is secondary. At the teachers' strike yesterday, similar arguments were made by young teachers, who referred to many of the government policies they were protesting against seeming to consider children and students as units of learning, rather than young people with a future to be nurtured by caring teachers. The teachers are worried about their pay, conditions and pensions, just as the postal workers, the health workers, fire fighters and others – the public sector in other words, which people of a certain political bent insist need to be crushed for progress to be made. Workers have always fought back however, and the success of their fight depends on as many ordinary people as possible recognising that it is not only just, but also in their own interest to support these struggles. Paul Robeson recognised this, and suffered for it. It however remains a fight worth fighting, and the call to arms is as urgent today as ever, as more of our public services are being primed for sale to the highest bidder. I hope you enjoy the show.
