

CALL MR. ROBESON: A life, with songs.

Written and Performed by Tayo Aluko, with Michael Conliffe, Piano

Tristan Bates Theatre, Covent Garden, Wednesday 2 October, 2013.

Greetings, and Welcome. “There is nothing wrong with profit”, says the leader of the Conservative Party in closing his party conference. That is to be expected from a champion of market capitalism, and it reminds one of the quote from the film, Wall Street, in which the more memorable quote was “Greed is good”. Well, we all know where thinking like that has brought the world economy, but the profit quote, though less objectionable, is not necessarily as innocent as the Prime Minister would like us to believe. Working in an industry where the phrase “profit share” is quite regularly heard – that being a system arrived at by necessity (given the paucity of resources and the uncertainty of the economics of the arts sector) – one wonders whether it is a concept that the utilities industries for instance might be interested in taking on board? Even if the Labour Party is not talking about re-nationalising those industries or resisting the privatisation of Royal Mail (how could they?) does the concept of industry bosses sharing profits with workers and customers feature in Tory thinking? I suspect not, because that smacks too much of full-blown “socialism”. There are however, successful businesses here in the UK that work very well on the profit-share model – the John Lewis Partnership and The Phone Co-op (of which I am a member) being two examples. The latter is of course much less known than the former, but there they both are, proving that “there is nothing wrong with sharing profit” or “profit share is good”. That kind of thinking is sadly unfashionable these days, but we know that “fashionable” is not necessarily the right way to be, and often in fact leads us down a destructive path. The idea of giving people a fairer share of the world’s resources is what Paul Robeson saw as attractive in the communist/socialist system, however dysfunctional the Soviet leaders rendered it. We however know that the capitalist system we live under is also dysfunctional, and we need people to suggest alternatives that will save humanity and the planet. They are out there, these people, and we would do well to seek them out, heed their advice and warning, and, as Paul Robeson urged people to do in his time, recognise the power that we all have to bring about change. I hope you enjoy the show.
