

CALL MR. ROBESON: A life, with songs.
Written and Performed by Tayo Aluko, with Thomas Kell, Piano
Clapham Library, London. Friday, October 5, 2018

Greetings, Welcome. Dancing Queen was played as she approached the dais to close the Conservative Party conference. She joked about staying up all night fixing the signage behind her, and then made a speech that sections of the press praised glowingly. That is down to interpretation, I suppose, as was the description of her movements as she entered stage left as dance. The image of someone trying desperately to fix a broken, crumbling house on meagre resources comes to mind, and it looked to me that the home keeper, in full view of the nation, brazenly helped herself to some of her neighbour's bricks: like the idea of starting a council house-building programme, and ending austerity! Mrs. May must be admired though, for giving the illusion of being original in her thinking as well as appearing to hold firm to her principles while those around her pull her Party in all directions over Brexit. In that one regard alone, she is on the same page with the leader of the opposition whose detractors within his party and without are doing their best to undermine him with all kinds of allegations. He is standing firm and remaining calm, and apparently taking huge swathes of the British public with him on a road to a more socialist future – as much as modern politics and society will allow. Paul Robeson knew a thing or two about taking abuse from all sides while holding firm onto the strongly held belief that his country could be better than it was in his time, and that socialism would be part of that better tomorrow. The truth of those two positions is ever more obvious now, with the hijacking of the levers of power by reactionaries so soon after a self-declared socialist saw the Democratic Party Presidential ticket stolen from him by the Party establishment. The elite's sense of entitlement was shown to be a bad mistake in that case, and the display of privilege and entitlement by the maybe soon-to-be confirmed Supreme Court Judge may similarly have unforeseen consequences.
